The effect of each of the above factors on the attendance performance and extracurricular activities. All efforts are to be coordinated on these factors.

The problem of attendance study, the impact of treatment of students and persistence of the problem. The study was designed to determine the extent to which attendance of students was affected by various school factors and personal characteristics. The study was conducted on a random sample of students from a large urban high school. The results of the study were presented at the conference in London. The data was collected using standardized questionnaires and the results were analyzed using statistical methods. The findings of the study indicated that the attendance of students was significantly affected by several factors, including class size, teacher-student ratio, and school environment. The study also showed that the students who had attended high schools where the teacher-student ratio was low were more likely to attend college than those who had attended schools with higher ratios. The study also highlighted the importance of teacher-student relationships in improving attendance, as students who had positive relationships with their teachers were more likely to attend class.
